The CENENITEL Project Collaboration

Recently TSS Chair Bryan Young and TSS director Ruth Waldick met with Shauna Johnson, Marine Land Use Planner from the W̱SÁNEĆ Leadership Council, and Shauna Doll the Gulf Islands Forest Project Coordinator at the Raincoast Conservation Foundation.

The team discussed the next steps in developing the CENENITEL project. This project will aim to braid Traditional Indigenous Knowledge and western science to restore Indigenous culture, ecosystems, and store carbon. Keep checking our website for updates on this exciting new collaboration!

Updates from the Maxwell Watershed Project Team

On March 2nd the TSS Maxwell Watershed Project Team was onsite documenting wetlands and surface water flows as a first step in understanding the hydrology of Maxwell Creek Watershed.

By mapping the surface hydrology and vegetation in the watershed, the team is prioritizing areas for restoration that will also help control sediment and nutrient in the lake and reduce erosion and damage to the Maxwell Road.

Protect Your Drinking Water

As World Water Day is coming up on March 22, we are reminded of the freshwater challenges on our island home.

Whether your water comes from groundwater, lakes, or rain cisterns, all of the island's drinking water is sourced from rain. As climate change brings drier spring weather and long prolonged droughts, it's important to know what you can be doing to protect and safeguard your drinking water storage.

The Salt Spring Island Watershed Protection Alliance (SSIWPA) has put together a list of educational resources to help you adapt to these changes.
